This puzzle will require internet use. If you would like to confirm a clue phrase, feel free to ask a staffer.

An alarming journey through Hell is also reminding you of your own past. Boston broadly has seen a great number of these events, leading up to the one happening today. Can conjuring up the deeds of your past tell you where to go so that you can understand the modern city?

1. You first consider where you are today, running through different potential historical stories for the city. Aliens, Vikings, Hell, Cats... what does it all mean?
2. You then think back to a time when in one location, multiple events happened simultaneously. Triangles were both musical and geographical, and three factions battled it out in some sort of twisted inversion of another similar event.
3. Next you think about a time when you were far away, both in time and in space, the furthest way you've ever been! Were you even allowed to go there?
4. Now you remember a time of gallant heroes and phar-phetched stories, and a premature fight against a phearphul radiation golem you had to survive.
5. After that you consider a time when all you cared about was going as fast as possible in some kind of version of a speedy reality competition. You were the amazing Leslie Gallant, and the world was your speedway.
6. You next think about a massive party with gifts of iron, one that you had skipped over, searched for, and finally found.
7. Finally, you return to where it all began... where a concerned group of citizens fought against these soft, floccose lifeforms that arrived above the city.
8. Huh, that's weird... I don't remember anything about this... Did it even happen?
